1059th Meeting July 28, 2004. The 1894 San Francisco Midwinter Fair Rick Webster (reviewed by Herb Miles)

Rick Webster, who has already spoken to the Society once this year, spoke again, this time on the 1894 California Midwinter Fair, also known as “The Fantastic Fair.”

For San Franciscans, the name Michael de Young is very famous as the namesake for the wonderful museum in Golden Gate Park and as founder of the San Francisco Chronicle newspaper, but he was also the driving force behind the 1894 Midwinter Fair. After visiting Chicago Columbian Exposition in 1892, he believed that San Francisco should do something similar.

Deciding that Golden Gate Park would be a suitable location for the fair to the consternation of McLaren and Stowe, builders and caretakers of the park, de Young raised $40,000 from private sources, secured 180 acres of the park, and began building temporary buildings in a classical style.

Most of the buildings were flimsy and designed to be removed at the end of the fair, but several remain to this day including the Japanese Tea Garden and the Music Concourse. For the most part, the attractions were designed to make money, prizes were awarded in horticulture, invention, ethnology, and many other subjects popular at the time. At least 36 California counties participated, and 5 states set up pavilions including Hawaii and Arizona.

Bonet’s Electrical Tower was the crowning achievement featuring a light beam that could be seen for miles. Other attractions included Dante’s Inferno, the Haunted Swing, Cairo Street with the popular belly dancers, and a Firth’s Wheel (a Ferris Wheel) fully 385 feet above the fair and holding 160 persons.

Exhibitions of Eskimos, natives from Africa (maybe), Hawaiian Hula dancers, and several nude art exhibits gave the straight-laced and religious visitors pause. Many exhibits had been shipped from Chicago en masse and reassembled for San Francisco’s delight.

This fair was a success for all involved and made a profit of about $66,000. Even though the exhibitors had promised to dismantle the buildings after it was over, they reneged on their offer so McLaren in great delight blew them up in 1896, all except the Japanese Tea Garden which he enjoyed!

Exhibits

Michael Wehner exhibited a nicely preserved 1788 Angelsey “Druid” token and discussed a Dahomey Village camel ride token which he believes was used at the Midwinter Fair and should be re-attributed in the Atwood-Coffee catalog to San Francisco.

Ken Takahashi brought a book of illustrations from the Midwinter Fair featuring the buildings and other beautiful landmarks of this purely San Francisco event.

Gordon Donnell exhibited a set of “encased cents” from Numismatic News and a Tenino, Washington Wooden check.

Jack Free brought his recently received Lewis and Clark Coin & Currency Set, a grouping of 1894 Midwinter tokens/medals, along with a batch of 2005 Redbooks.

Herb Miles brought two Bank of California postcards, showing the old building as it was in the early 20th century.

Elliot Wehner just back from the ANA Summer Seminar brought along his current grouping of Military Payment Certificates acquired at the seminar, Series 681 & 691, and some current Military “pogs”.

Larry Reppeteau exhibited his 2004 Euro Irish set.

Mark Wm. Clark in keeping with the theme of the evening brought something entirely different, an Italian 10 Centesimi of 1911 celebrating the 50th year of the Republic.

And of course, Speaker for the Night Rick Webster, brought his collection of 1894 Midwinter tokens/medals along with a book describing the fair and its history.
