MAY MEETING RECAP

President Dan Hipple reported to the membership about the status of attempts to purchase the 1000th Meeting die. Honorary memberships for Becky Cieniewicz and Ruth M. Phillips were approved.

Federico Castillo gave a fascinating presentation, the first of two parts, about the National Irrigation Congress and its impact on the water and development in the Southwest. Americans traveling west to settle the plains, mountains, and deserts found that the semi-arid and arid climates were not conducive to agriculture. In most areas, water rights were assigned to property owners adjacent to the water source, or those who could make the best use of the water; uses that frequently did not include provisions for the environment as a whole. The emphasis was on private ownership of water resources, with little or no consideration to the greater public good.

By the late 19th Century, the notion of public ownership of water became more widely accepted, in part because of the expansion of agriculture in the Central Valley of California, and the increasing demands of larger cities, like San Francisco and Los Angeles. In 1891, representatives of states and territories from North Dakota to Texas to California to Washington formed the National Irrigation Congress (NIC), which, over the ensuing quarter-century (when it became the International Irrigation Congress), made a lasting mark on water rights and usage patterns across the western United States. While the specific objectives of the NIC were not always clear, the overarching theme was to use water to "conquer the desert" and make it fit for agriculture. Covered by the moniker "Reclamation," most of the large water projects in the west, including the Los Angeles Aqueduct, Central Valley Project, Hoover Dam, and so on were a direct result of the advocacy of the NIC/IIC.

Federico illustrated his presentation with examples of medals and tokens of the NIC's periodic meetings held between 1891 and 1916.

Following the presentation, President Hipple announced that Past President and current Governor Herb Miles would be relocating to Southern California later this summer. Herb was roundly thanked for his many contributions to PCNS, including the raffle prizes at most monthly meetings. Thank you, Herb!
